

“Active Love” in the Brothers Karamazov:
A Response to the Problem of Suffering

Submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the Bachelor of Arts degree in the Program of Liberal Studies

Gabriel Griggs

Class of 2014

Directed by: Jennifer Newsome Martin, Visiting Assistant Professor

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to thank my thesis advisor, Jennifer Martin, for her constant encouragement and honest feedback throughout the writing process. I would also like to thank my friend, Dennis Monokroussos, who has been a tremendous help throughout the process. In particular, he directed my attention to Eleonore Stump, whose work is featured prominently in this thesis. He also gave great encouragement and clear and honest feedback.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank my mother for everything she has done for me throughout my life and for her sacrifice in securing my education. She has been a source of constant love, support and inspiration. My father, who passed away in 2007, has also been a great inspiration to me and this project in particular.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

1.1 What is the Problem of Suffering?

The problem of suffering is essentially as follows: if there is a good and omnipotent God he would not allow suffering in the world; there is suffering in the world; therefore, there is no God. This, at least, is the philosophical argument in its proper form. It is a common argument against God's existence and, consequently, it also has a philosophical counterpart in an argument known as the "free will defense". Alvin Plantinga has a particularly strong free will defense which can be summarized as such: a world with human free will is most desirable; God cannot cause humans to do what is right without violating free will; therefore, it is logically possible that evil can exist concurrently with God. Purely from a logical point of view, both arguments are worth analyzing. What is important to note, however, is the particular emphasis on suffering which is often equated with evil, as if this necessarily follows — but, in fact, it does not necessarily follow that suffering — even of innocent children — is evil.

This impulse to equate suffering of the innocent with evil is, more than anything, a visceral response that, at a glance, seems to be a product of more modern times. Using the book of Job as a proxy for their takes on the problem of suffering, something that becomes apparent is that Gregory the Great and Aquinas, two great representatives of Christianity for their times periods, viewed suffering in a redemptive light. Suffering, as it is described in their commentaries on Job, is meant to purify the soul and bring the soul closer to true happiness, which for Aquinas is actually defined by contemplation of God — not material wealth, earthly joy or even health, but contemplation of God. This redemptive view of suffering is one that clearly depends on belief in the afterlife to be convincing, but assuming this, it is a strong and logically coherent argument.

The tendency to equate innocent suffering with moral evil is such a visceral response that it is worth asking: is the logical argument really the problem? Further, is God's existence really what's at stake? Or, to put it bluntly, is it simply a matter of not accepting the world as God has made it? This might be a more accurate portrayal of the situation — one in which we simply cannot accept that God would allow suffering of innocent children. This is a view that is expressed concretely in the character of Ivan Karamazov in Dostoevsky's Brothers Karamazov who simply “cannot accept” God's world — despite an unwavering belief in God's existence. Another illuminating aspect of Ivan Karamazov is that he realizes that, logically, God is the reason that ties together morality and that God, in fact, is the very source of his great compassion for the suffering of the innocent.

The suffering of the innocent evokes a strong emotional response and it can certainly be a tremendous obstacle to adopting belief in the Christian God. For this very reason, however, it is one of the most important questions to overcome in order to establish a strong and mature faith. Perhaps it is for this reason that it is featured so prominently in Dostoevsky's novel — “These fools could not even conceive so strong a denial of God as the one to which I gave expression.”¹ This is something that he wrote in his letters as he was writing the novel. But the Brothers Karamazov is an expression of Christianity attempting to overcome this problem. It does this through the story that unfolds and in the presentation of the novel an ‘argument’ emerges for Christianity and for Zosima’s active love. I say ‘argument’ because it is not really an argument so much as an expression of a way of life that touches the whole human person.

¹Osborn, Ronald. “Beauty Will Save the World: Metaphysical Rebellion and the Problem of Theodicy in Dostoevsky's Brothers Karamazov.” Modern Age 54, no. 1-4 (2012). http://www.academia.edu/2512653/Beauty_Will_Save_the_World_Metaphysical_Rebellion_and_the_Problem_of_Theodicy_in_Dostoevskys_Brothers_Karamazov (accessed December 7, 2013), endnote 13.

The Christian narrative, as it is expressed in the Gospels, and the accompanying Christology is particularly poignant on this point: Christ became fully man and he suffered death on a cross. He, too, cried at the death of loved ones as he did at the tomb of Lazarus and he, himself, felt the pains of death. What greater illustration of our inability to avoid suffering is there than this simple fact: Christ could not avoid death on a cross. This fact alone seems to prove this point: suffering is now a permanent part of our worldly existence. It may not have been necessary to human existence before the ‘fall’, but it is now something that we cannot avoid — even Christ could not avoid it. Thus, suffering has a very integral part in the Christian narrative. Suffering plays a part in our understanding of ourselves in relation to God, in understanding our purpose in this world and in our daily existence. It is a problem that touches everyone in some form or another and, for this reason, it is an issue that is worth discussing.

1.2 Redemptive Suffering: Aquinas’ Answer to the Problem of Suffering

Aquinas’ commentary on Job begins with his acknowledgement of Gregory the Great’s moral commentary on Job. In this commentary, Gregory starts from the perspective that the “lord in loving-kindness permitted that [evil works] to be done [to Job]... for when the enemy had got leave to have him with the purpose of destroying him, by his temptations he effected that his merits were augmented.”² In other words, Job is a book of moral teachings that will enable us to grow closer to God and the inflictions of this life are both tests and opportunities for spiritual growth. For this reason, Gregory operates with a mystical reading of Job. We see a similar perspective in Aquinas who understands that the “whole intention of this book [Job] is directed to this: to show that human affairs are ruled by divine providence using probable arguments.”³

²Gregory the Great. Morals on the Book of Job. pp. 7.

Both of these commentaries, taken together, offer quite a different starting perspective than that of Ivan, whose modern view is predominantly concerned with a higher justice being found on earth. Aquinas and Gregory advocate the complete opposite initial interpretative assumption: that the ultimate end of man is to be found in heaven, not on earth. Aquinas, in particular, articulates this view to such an extent that the modern question of whether or not evil/suffering contradicts the existence of God does not even come across in his work. Eleonore Stump explains in her essay, Aquinas on the Sufferings of Job, that: “... Aquinas sees the problem in the book of Job differently. He seems not to recognize that suffering in the world, of the quantity and quality of Job’s, calls into question God’s goodness, let alone God’s existence. Instead Aquinas understands the book as an attempt to come to grips with the nature and operations of divine providence.” The question for Aquinas is not whether suffering/evil in the world means that God cannot exist. Instead the question is: how does suffering/evil fit into God’s providential work?

1.3 The Inadequacy of Analytic Philosophy in Solving Suffering

We see in Ivan and Job a complex and nuanced faith. Both have the theoretical and philosophical strength to defend themselves and their arguments. Job eventually comes to realize that this is not enough — he must come to see God, not only hear him. Similarly, despite Ivan’s greatest attempts to be purely rational, he cannot escape the innate desire to live and he acknowledges this. Acknowledging this innate, irrational desire, implies that Ivan is recognizing another form of wisdom outside of reason alone. Yet, Ivan still fancies himself to be like a Euclidean geometrician — something, perhaps, akin to an analytic philosopher.

³Aquinas, Thomas. Commentary on the Book of Job. Prologue, pp. 3.

The philosopher Eleonore Stump, in her work Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering, discusses the analytic Anglo-American tradition of philosophy. She brings out two pertinent points to our discussion in her Philosophy and Narrative chapter: that analytic philosophy does not do justice to interpersonal, right-brained modes of thought and that the problem of suffering is inherently an interpersonal problem. “In particular, in its emphasis on left-brain mediated pattern-processing, philosophy in the Anglo-American tradition has tended to leave to one side the messy and complicated issues involved in relations among persons.”⁴ She continues this discussion by pointing to the fact that analytic philosophers, in dealing with interpersonal issues, do not draw their cases from complex real life issues nor “the world’s great literature.”⁵ She continues: “Personal relations, however, are at the heart of certain philosophical problems. Central to the problem of suffering in all its forms, for example, is a question to which a consideration of interpersonal relations is maximally relevant: could a person who is omnipotent, omniscient, and perfectly good allow human persons to suffer as they do?”⁶

It is for this very reason that Stump suggests a marriage between the two intellectual disciplines of literature and philosophy. This marriage, she suggests, would address the “shortcomings of analytic philosophy while preserving its characteristic excellences.”⁷ Furthermore, and most importantly, Stump presents a strong argument that “there are things to know which can be known through narrative but which can-⁴Stump, Eleonore. “Philosophy and Narrative.” In Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010. Oxford Scholarship Online, 2010. doi: 10.1093/acprof:oso/9780199277421.003.0002, 3.

⁵ibid, 3

⁶ibid,4.

⁷ibid,4

not be known as well, if at all, through the methods of analytic philosophy.”⁸ Note that analytic philosophy is characterized by: being “in the habit of categorizing by means of sets of abstract properties, and the labels it uses in categorizing are designations of summarizing those properties. So, for example, Descartes’ theory of knowledge shares with various contemporary theories of knowledge the properties of taking knowledge to be built up on a foundation, of supposing the foundation to be basic beliefs...”⁹ This description and its comparison to Descartes sounds strikingly familiar to the character of Ivan Karamazov and his desire to build upon Euclidean logic. It is not surprise, then, that Descartes’ criterion for certainty is the very same criterion of “clear and distinct” that is present in Euclid’s geometry.

1.4 The Nature of Faith

Faith is a nuanced concept in that it encompasses both rational understanding, something similar to philosophical assent, and a sense of giving oneself to, or trusting in, the person of Christ. This nuance becomes clear in the translation of Isaiah 7:9, as Pope Emeritus Benedict explains in his Introduction to Christianity: “A more literal translation would be, “If you do not believe [if you do not hold firm to Yahweh], then you will have no foothold (Is 7:9). The one root word ’....mn (amen) embraces a variety of meanings whose interplay and differentiation go to make up the subtle grandeur of this sentence. It includes the meanings truth, firmness, firm ground, ground, and furthermore the meanings of loyalty, to trust, entrust oneself, take one’s stand on something, believe in something; thus faith in God appears as a holding on to God through which man gains a firm foothold for his life. Faith is thereby defined as taking up a position, as taking a stand trustfully on the ground of the word of ⁹Stump, Eleonore. “Narrative as a Means of Knowledge: Francis and Dominic.” Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010. Oxford Scholarship Online, 2010. doi: 10.1093/acprof:oso/9780199277421.003.0003, 4.

⁸ibid, 4

God. The Greek translation of the Old Testament ... transferred the above-mentioned sentence onto Greek soil not only linguistically, but also conceptually by formulating it as "If you do not believe, then you do not understand, either."¹⁰

We now have a helpful paradigm for understanding Job's second response which highlights, perhaps, a greater sense of trusting in God and not only intellectually understanding God, as the Greek translation highlights. In Job's belief, we can see a model of a 'system of meaning'¹¹ that encompasses more than a single methodology of thought. A helpful way of understanding this sort of belief is through Ratzinger's answer to the question, "What is belief really?." He says that it "is a human way of taking up a stand in the totality of reality, a way that cannot be reduced to knowledge and is incommensurable with knowledge; it is the bestowal of meaning without which the totality of man would remain homeless, on which man's calculations and actions are based, and without which, in the last resort he could not calculate and act, because he can only do this in the context of a meaning that bears him up."¹² Can a child's belief in the love of her mother, or a husband's love for his wife, really be described with philosophical framework alone?

A philosophical solution to theodicy is not going to have the completeness of a solution which encompasses more of the human experience and the human imagination. In discussing the inadequacy of understanding the world through one means only, Rowan Williams says that "... no system of perceiving and receiving the world can fail to depend upon imagination, the capacity to see and speak into and out of a world that defies any final settlement as to how it shall be described."¹³ Thus, we turn to scripture — which, in the Catholic interpretation, is overflowing with meaning that ¹⁰XVI, Pope Benedict. Introduction to Christianity. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 2004, 69.

¹¹Williams, Rowan. Dostoevsky: Language, Faith, and Fiction. London: Continuum, 2009, vii.

¹²XVI, Pope Benedict. Introduction to Christianity, 72.

¹³Williams, Rowan. Dostoevsky: Language, Faith and Fiction, viii.

is understand through philosophy, but also poetically — and we are also justified in turning to films and novels to better understand Job’s problem, theodicy and God’s response to Job.

1.5 The Necessity of Narrative

Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov is one novel that is especially thorough in its portrayal of theodicy and in its ‘answer’. In this novel, we have “Dostoevsky’s most compelling and sympathetic rebel against faith” in Ivan Karamazov.¹⁴ Ivan’s argument with God is that by “giving humans freedom, God has become complicit in the senseless, unending, unredeemable suffering of the innocent.”¹⁵ Believing this to be the case, Ivan openly refuses to accept God. This will be discussed later, but it is important to note that Ivan is the intellectual amongst the Karamazov brothers and that his arguments are purely rational. Furthermore, it is even questionable as to whether or not Ivan has convinced himself with his logic:

I want to live, and I do live, even if it be against logic. Though I do not believe in the order of things, still the sticky little leaves that come out in the spring are dear to me, the blue sky is dear to me, some people are dear to me, whom one loves sometimes, would you believe it, without knowing why.”¹⁶

What we see here is that even Ivan, with his emphasis on ‘Euclidean Logic’, has not been able to live his life purely through logic. Human life encompasses more than logic and this is precisely the vein that Dostoevsky uses to build his case for faith. It is important to note that Dostoevsky does not refute Ivan directly, or even with ‘Euclidean Logic’. Rather, his “reply to Ivan’s materialism is based upon a poetic revelation of the existential results of his ideas as manifest in his life and the lives of those around him...”¹⁷ These existential results show us that Ivan cannot continue leading his life the way that he does, that it is simply not a sustainable ‘philosophy of life’. We even begin to see this in Ivan’s admission that he cannot explain his desire to live nor his desire to love. Ultimately, the argument for belief in God, despite the overwhelming suffering of the innocent, lies in embracing gratitude as a created being. This is the ‘answer’ to theodicy that is put forth not only in Job, but also in Malik’s Tree of Life and Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov. God’s response to Job leads us back to creation and in Genesis we learn that God has created us, in His own image, out of love.

¹⁴Osborn, Ronald. “Beauty Will Save the World: Metaphysical Rebellion and the Problem of Theodicy in Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov.”, 101.

¹⁵*ibid*, 102.

¹⁶Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2002, 230.

We already see this answer forming in Ivan’s appreciation of life and nature. We see this answer forming in Brad Pitt’s reflection in the Tree of Life, “I’m nothing. Look at the glory around us. trees and birds. I lived in shame. I dishonored it all and didn’t notice the glory. I’m a foolish man.” Structurally, then, the arc that we can follow will be this: starting with the text of Job itself, we understand that God’s response leads Job to Genesis; an analysis of Genesis, will lead us to a number of important themes, the primary one being that humans are created by God out of love; at this point, we will look at two pieces of human imagination that grapple with theodicy: The Tree of Life and Brothers Karamazov. Both of these works speak to an answer to the theodicy that is not only theoretical, but that is tested against reality. After all, the question of theodicy is not merely a theoretical mind-game. It is a question of how to live in the world. In fact, we see in Ivan a tenderness — in his disgust with suffering — that is absent from the faith. This is ultimately what we see in Ivan’s “if there is no God, everything is permitted.” Perhaps it is the acknowledgement of this fact that does not allow Ivan to completely embrace his philosophical rebellion. Perhaps, too, Ivan's hesitation to fully live out his logical conclusion reveals another aspect of the question of theodicy, that it is a question not so much about whether or not God exists, but whether or not we can accept the terms of the world God has created. It is these very terms, manifest in the physical decay of Zosima's body, that cause even Alyosha to doubt God. Thus, as Rowan Williams alludes to in his introduction to Dostoevsky: Language, Faith and Fiction, the "crisis is not so much, then, about whether God exists, but about what the nature is of God's relation with the world, and most of all with the human world."¹⁸ This crisis is the embodiment of a 'serious spiritual perception' which states that "God exists but I'm not sure whether I believe in him."¹⁹ This, ultimately, then is a question of belief in objective meaning. And, as Ratzinger tells us in his Introduction to Christianity: the "Christian faith lives on the discovery that not only is there such a thing as objective meaning but that this meaning knows me and loves me, that I can entrust myself to it like the child who knows that everything he may be wondering about is safe in the "you" of his mother."²⁰ This, ultimately, seems to be the answer that Job arrives at as well. In order to make the argument for her claim that there are things to know which can only be known through narrative, Stump categorizes two modes of thought in a typological manner: the Dominican system and the Franciscan. "Categorizing on the basis of sets of abstract properties and abstract designations can itself be thought of as Dominican; categorizing on the basis of typology, which requires acquaintance with stories and persons, can be taken as Franciscan."²¹ After briefly introducing these typologies, Stump explains that in "case the thing being ¹⁸Williams, Rowan. Dostoevsky: Language, Faith, and Fiction, viii.

¹⁷Osborn, Ronald. “Beauty Will Save the World: Metaphysical Rebellion and the Problem of Theodicy in Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov.”, 102.

¹⁹ibid,8.

²⁰XVI, Pope Benedict. Introduction to Christianity, 80.

²¹Stump, Eleonore. "Narrative as a Means of Knowledge: Francis and Dominic." In Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering, 4.

characterized is not amenable to crisp definition and precision, then, paradoxically, the vague but intuitive Franciscan approach will be more accurate than the Dominican approach, whose search for an unavailable accuracy will result in carefully patterned mischaracterization.”²² She continues to explain that while Dominic’s ministry is grounded in argumentation, Francis’ ministry “is grounded in his personal response to a personal call from a suffering incarnate deity. The rebuilding of Christ’s church that Francis was called to do is based on Francis’ personal relationship to the person of Christ...”²³ The very nature of the typological Franciscan understanding is a personal relationship — and the “knowledge of the ultimate foundation of reality, knowledge of morality, and knowledge of the good life are all best understood as knowledge of persons.”²⁴ This is strikingly similar to the change that occurs in Job as well as the proposal of active love, which is a love that entirely focused on personal relationships.

The argument continues with a contrast between two types of knowledge. Knowledge that, in analytic philosophy “knowledge is a matter of having an attitude toward a proposition, of knowing that...”²⁵ In this view, even statements such as ‘I believe in God’ are transformed into statements of ‘I believe p because you tell me that p’, giving us a statement such as, ‘I believe that God exists and is good and trustworthy’.²⁶ Yet, the argument continues, this is clearly not the only way in which we can know. In contrast, “some analytic philosophers, most famously Bertrand Russell, have contrasted knowing that with knowing by acquaintance.”²⁷ Stump is quick to point out that the theory of knowing by acquaintance is less developed than the theory of knowing that. This, perhaps, is to be expected as knowing by acquaintance

²²ibid, 4.

²³ibid, 9.

²⁴ibid, 11.

²⁵ibid, 14.

²⁶ibid, 13.

²⁷ibid, 15.

does not itself lead to rigorous analytical analysis. Despite this, there Stump provides a thought experiment that makes the point clear: The thought experiment involves a neuroscientist Mary who knows everything there is to know about the brain, including everything there is to know about the way in which the brain processes color, but who has had no perceptual experience of color of any sort because from birth she has been isolated (by some suitable villain) in a black-and-white environment. Now suppose that Mary is finally rescued from her imprisonment and perceives color for the first time... it seems clear that she comes to know something new when she first sees colors. But the problem is not just that no neuroscience books could give her the knowledge she acquires when she first sees red. No books could give her this knowledge. There are certain first-person knowledge states that cannot be adequately acquired or expressed by means of propositional attitudes. That is why, when Mary first knows redness in virtue of perceiving it, it is hard to express what she knows adequately in terms of knowing that.²⁸

This experiment is a key illustration of the sort of knowledge that we are trying to identify throughout this thesis. Furthermore, it is a key illustration of the necessity of incorporating other forms of knowledge — such as narrative and literature — into our discussion. Ultimately, the ‘answer’ to the problem of suffering is grounded in a personal relationship with God — to use Stump’s terminology, it is a Franciscan answer. Thus, it will be vague by definition. But we can note certain key aspects of the answer: it is based in a relationship with God, a relationship with other created beings (Zosima’s active love) and it defies reduction to a rational principle in the same way that Ivan cannot explain his desire to live.

²⁸ibid, 15-16.

1.6 Statement of Thesis and Layout of Work

This thesis proposes that the problem of suffering, an inherently interpersonal problem, must be solved in an all-inclusive way of life that is much more than a ‘philosophy of life’. The exact way of life that is proposed is Zosima’s active love that is displayed in Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov. Active love is a way of being that has three particular characteristics: it is rooted in gratitude and a proper understanding of man’s relationship with God (i); it is characterized by proper perspective (ii) in two ways: it recognizes that suffering is not always going to be understandable (iii) and it focuses on particulars instead of broad and complicated generalities (it deals with a particular person instead of ‘humanity’) (iv); it accepts reality as it is, whether that be man’s fallenness or in a sort of ‘higher justice or purpose’ of suffering manifesting itself in this life (v). In these ways, active love is firmly compatible with Christianity and, in fact, is a clear ‘way of life’ that is rooted in Christianity. Gratitude necessarily follows from the Christian belief that we are created beings entirely dependent on God — the very God who made man in his image and breathed life into him. Just as Christ told us that we serve him by serving the poor, so too does active love focus on seeing Christ in all people. Just as Christ could not avoid death on a cross, so too man cannot avoid suffering. Christ became fully human, accepting man on man’s own terms of fallenness, and suffered despite his innocence. Yet, precisely the point that was darkest in the Christian narrative — Christ’s complete gift of himself — was also its great triumph. This is exactly the message that Zosima teaches: when one has given themselves entirely, when they are at their breaking point, precisely at that point will God’s grace restore them and invigorate them.

This paper will work through these aspects of active love in the order they have been presented. Gratitude and man’s relationship with God (i) and man’s proper relationship with God is the focus of the first section. This section makes extensive use of the text of Job and, because God's speeches to Job are direct references to creation, the text of Genesis. The primary point of emphasis in this section is that God directs Job's attention to creation — signalling that creation (and its lessons) marks the turning point for Job, leading him into a more complete relationship with God. Benedict XVI's, then Cardinal Ratzinger, issued a number of relevant homilies which will be a primary source of information on Genesis. Proper perspective (ii) will be discussed in the following section, with the intention of elucidating two points: that Ivan Karamazov's dilemma will never be completely resolved (iii), which has the Brothers Karamazov as its primary material, and that the key to active love is seeing Christ in all people (iv) — and focusing on each individual person — which will also have Dostoevsky's novel as its main source. The final section of the paper will focus on active love's emphasis on accepting life as it is (v). This final section will primarily focus on Ivan Karamazov's rebellion, his grand inquisitor and, accordingly, Zosima's counter-responses within his active love.

CHAPTER 2

GRATITUDE

2.1 Job

Then Job answered the Lord: “I know that thou canst do all things, and that no purpose of thine can be thwarted. ‘Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge?’ Therefore I have uttered what I did not understand, things too wonderful for me, which I did not know. ‘Hear, and I will speak; I will question you, and you declare to me.’ I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee; therefore I despise myself, and repent in dust and ashes.”¹

This is an illustration of the dialectical property of faith — that faith must be received. Furthermore, it also illustrates the fact that faith operates on a different plane than philosophy. Job has had an intellectual understanding of God. This is the understanding that enables him to question God and approach him so fearlessly. With this intellectual understanding, Job is like a lawyer, defending himself against the charges of his companions and presenting his case to God. Yet, the very fact that Job says, ‘my ears had heard of you but now my eyes have seen you’, illustrates that his understanding of God was incomplete and, perhaps, naive.

”Hear, and I will speak;” Job here is learning that faith and understanding of God is much more than simply an intellectual assent to God, His existence and His laws. Faith, ultimately, is not belief in an idea, instead faith is a belief in a person, in Christ. Furthermore, we learn that through his interaction with God, Job has come to understand God differently. He has come to see God, not just hear God. This change in perception, coupled with Job's repentance, illustrates that Job has come to a fuller appreciation of God. What else could explain Job's repentance after such an unusual response from God?

¹Edited by May, Herbert G., and Bruce Manning Metzger. ”The Book of Job.” In The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha: Revised standard version, containing the second edition of the New Testament and an expanded edition of the Apocrypha. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977. 613-655, Job 42:1-6

“‘Who is this that hides counsel without knowledge?’ Therefore I have uttered what I did not understand, things too wonderful for me, which I did not know.” God does not attempt to explain the calamities that have befallen Job. God does not say, ‘Job, I wanted to test your faith, so I let the devil do all of these terrible things to you.’ Instead, the response is to question Job and his place in creation. “Where were you when I laid the foundation of the earth? Tell me, if you have understanding. Who determined its measurements — surely you know!”² It is certainly true that Job has been humbled by God's speech and certainly terrified.

“Behold, I am of small account; what shall I answer thee? I lay my hand on my mouth. I have spoken once, and I will not answer; twice, but I will proceed no further.”³ Job says in his first response. But has God simply beaten Job into submission? This does not appear to be the case because God continues to question Job, even after he has submitted to God his unworthiness. And after this second line of questioning, we see Job's response: “I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now my eye sees thee;”⁴ Not only is Job appreciating his place as God's creation, he is also growing in appreciation for God.

Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind: “Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge? Gird up your loins like a man, I will question you, and you shall declare to me. “Where were you when I laid the foundation of the earth? Tell me, if you have understanding. Who determined its measurements — surely you know! Or who stretched ²ibid, Job 38:4-5.

³ibid, Job 40:3-5.

⁴ibid, Job 42:5.

the line upon it? On what were its bases sunk, or who laid its cornerstone, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?⁵

Given the overpowering nature of God's response, some interpreters have claimed that the "divine speeches reveal God as a capricious, jealous tyrant who abuses his power."⁶ Others suggest that the "questions of the speeches are not designed to humiliate Job but to remind him of what he already knows. They enable him to realize anew that God establishes order in the cosmos... This order visible in the universe leads Job to trust God even when he does not understand why he suffers."⁷ While he may not be able to completely understand why he suffers, it is too simple to suggest that he cannot understand any aspect of his suffering. Furthermore, it is not a rationally satisfying answer to suggest that Job must simply trust in God.

Instead of a binary model in which Job either understands or he does not understand, we need a model that allows for growth. This model, then, is predicated upon the maturation of Job's faith. Throughout the course of the text of Job, a more compelling model would be to suggest that Job's faith develops from an immature, purely rational faith to a mature, relational faith in God. The starting point for this interpretation is the selection from Job 42:2-5 that is highlighted at the beginning of this section.

"Lord, I am ignorant of your ways and I was so foolish to trust myself instead of trusting in you," Job essentially says. This is easy to understand. Notice, however, that Job has undergone a change. He perceives God differently now: "My ears had heard of you..." By this we might understand that Job initially understood God in ⁵ibid, Job 38:1-7.

⁶Schifferdecker, Kathryn. Out of the Whirlwind: Creation Theology in the Book of Job. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Theological Studies, Harvard Divinity School :, 2008, 9.

⁷ibid, 9.

a rational way — in the way that he must in order to maintain his innocence and defend himself against the accusations of his companions. "But now my eyes see you." The Lord has made Himself present to Job in a deeper way. This reveals a relationship, perhaps, in which Job is justified in questioning God. Much like Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, Job has come into God's presence. This relationship is one between God the creator and Job the created. God's speech serves to humble Job, to keep him in line, this is certainly true. But Job's fault is not so much the questioning, as it is his doubting of God's goodness. "Lord, I thought that you were all good and most just. Why are you allowing these things to happen to me, your faithful and innocent servant?"

And here God speaks so that Job can hear. "Job, I am your creator! Do you not see the works I have created? Were you there when I laid the foundations of the earth? Why do you doubt my love for you? Do you not see the way that I care for the foolish ostrich that leaves its eggs on the ground unprotected? Do you not see the way that I care for my creation which I created out of love? Have I not brought you to life with my very own breath? Do not doubt my goodness, for I have created you and you are good." God, in his speech is reminding Job of the creator's love for his creation. He is also reminding Job that he is, in fact, a created being entirely dependent on the Lord's goodness.

2.2 Genesis

Here we arrive at some of the fundamental questions and answers in Genesis: what does it mean to be a created being, entirely dependent on God's goodness? In this relationship, we transcend simply hearing God and we come to see God. God reveals his creative nature to us in Genesis: "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth." The whole purpose of the first chapter of Genesis is to "say one thing: God created the world"⁸, as the Benedict tells us in his homilies on creation, this one thing is that: The world is not, as people used to think then, a chaos of mutually opposed forces... Rather, all of this comes from one power, from God's eternal Reason, which became - in the Word - the power of creation. All of this comes from the same Word of God that we meet in the act of faith. ... In addition, the world was freed so that reason might lift itself up to God and so that human beings might approach this God fearlessly...⁹

Job is aware of the fact that God created the world and created him, too: "Naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked shall I return; the Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."¹⁰ In other words, he has faith in God the creator. Through this faith, he meets God's eternal reason, the Word of God, and his reason is freed so that it might "lift itself up to God" and so that Job might "approach this God fearlessly." And there is no doubting that Job approaches God fearlessly.

And what is the result of Job approaching God fearlessly? Job comes to see God with his eyes. If we understand Job's 'hearing God' as his comprehending God through reason, we must understand Job's seeing God with his eyes as a new way of comprehending God. God's speech points us to Genesis where we learn that man is made in the "image and likeness" of God. As Benedict tells us, human "life stands under God's special protection, because each human being, however wretched or exalted he or she may be, however sick or suffering, however good-for-nothing or important, whether born or unborn, whether incurably ill or radiant with health -

⁸XVI, Pope Benedict. Translated by Boniface Ramsey, O.P.. In the Beginning: A Catholic Understanding of the Story of Creation and the Fall. Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans Pub. Co., 1995, 5.

⁹ibid, 5.

¹⁰Edited by May, Herbert G., and Bruce Manning Metzger. "The Book of Job." In The New Oxford Annotated Bible, Job 1:21.

[because] each one bears God's breath in himself or herself, each one is God's image" [emphasis mine].¹¹ This is the God of abundant and gratuitous love of Christian theology.

It is with this loving, creative God in mind that Zosima is able to interpret the story of Job the way that he does, without being convinced of God in a philosophical sense. In the same way that active love can mysteriously convince us of God's existence, so too does it lead to gratitude. This gratitude and the resulting joy is a mystery of life. It is the mystery of everyday life in which Job's suffering is gradually healed. The old grief and pain "gradually passes into quiet, tender joy; instead of young, ebullient blood comes a mild, serene old age: I bless the sun's rising each day and my heart sings to it as before, but now I love its setting even more, its long slanting rays, and with them quiet, mild, tender memories, dear images form the whole of a long and blessed life — and over all is God's truth, moving, reconciling, all-forgiving!"¹² When we look to Christ, who has been prefigured by Job, we realize that "the passing earthly image and eternal truth here touched each other. In the face of earthly truth, the enacting of eternal truth is accomplished."¹³ The truth in this phrase is that Christ became man and accepted death on a cross in order to redeem humanity. In Christ, the earthly truth of our created nature and our dependence on God touches the eternal truth of God's love for us. Christ is the personification of our relationship to God the creator. Because Christ, the son of God suffered, it is not merely a 'child-like' conviction that God exists and that he loves his creation. Instead, it becomes an unavoidable reality that the analytic mind cannot reduce to axioms without losing the meaning of the mystery.

¹¹Ramsey, O.P., Boniface, and Pope Benedict XVI. In the Beginning: A Catholic Understanding of the Story of Creation and the Fall, 45.

¹²Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue. 292

¹³*ibid*, 292.

When a grateful mind receives this mystery, it comes to understand the story of Job in this light, as Zosima explains: “Here the Creator, as in the first days of creation, crowning each day with praise: “That which I have created is good, “ looks at Job and again praises his creation. And Job, praising God, does not only serve him, but will also serve his whole creation, from generation to generation and unto ages of ages,” for to this he was destined. Lord, what a book, what lessons!”¹⁴ Zosima’s interpretation of Job is surprisingly similar to that of Aquinas in that there is a providential element to Job’s life. In this case, in God’s providence, Job is serving as a light to all those who are suffering. But where we see Zosima’s gratitude, a component of his active love, come into play is in the fact that he understands Job to be praising God. In Zosima’s eyes, it is considered a blessing for Job to be in the position to reaffirm the Lord’s words by living faithfully to the Lord. In this way, Job is blessed to reply to the Lord, “Yes, Lord. Your creation is good.”

¹⁴ibid, 292.

CHAPTER 3

PROPER PERSPECTIVE

3.1 Can it be resolved?

When Zosima asks Ivan: "Can it be that you really hold this conviction about the consequences of the exhaustion of men's faith in the immortality of their souls?"¹ We get the sense that Zosima is peering into Ivan's soul and sensing the depths of Ivan's troubled heart. Ivan response is coolly logical: "Yes, it was my contention. There is no virtue if there is no immortality."² This is the extension of Ivan's idea that 'if there is no God, everything is permitted.'³ As we will learn later, Ivan's fundamental problem is that he has both a firm belief in God and that he abhors the suffering of the innocent. He cannot reconcile these two and it is this very paradox that wrestles inside his soul. And yet, Zosima responds to Ivan not with logic, but instead with his sense of Ivan's unhappiness — his troubled heart.

"You are blessed if you believe so, or else most unhappy!"⁴ Blessedness and unhappiness — Zosima does not try and refute Ivan's logic. He accepts Ivan's argument and, instead, he turns to Ivan himself and attempts to speak to Ivan's real problem: his tormented heart. Zosima continues to address the real issue at hand:

This idea [that there is no virtue if there is no immortality] is not yet resolved in your heart and torments it. ... For the time being you, too, are toying, out of despair, with your magazine articles and drawing-room discussions, without believing in your own dialectics and smirking at them ¹ibid, 70.

²ibid, 70.

³ibid, 82.

⁴ibid, 82.

with your heart aching inside you. . . The question is not resolved in you, and there lies your great grief, for it urgently demands resolution. . .⁵

Of course, the accuracy of Zosima's read into Ivan's soul can be questioned. Are we reading what we ourselves want to see? In other words, are we siding with Zosima solely because he is presented as an elder monk? Or has the character of Ivan, as presented by Dostoevsky, been accurately captured in Zosima's? Our answer to this question comes from Ivan himself. "'But can it be resolved in myself? Resolved in a positive way?' Ivan Fyodorovich continued asking strangely, still looking at the elder with a certain inexplicable smile."⁶ This strange smile comes after a quick admission of sincerity on Ivan's part — "'But still, I wasn't quite joking either. . . ' Ivan Fyodorovich suddenly and strangely confessed—by the way, with a quick blush."[ibid, 70.] In both of these statements and gestures (the strange confession and blush; the strange smile), we get the sense that Ivan has emerged from his wall of logic and insincerity. We get the sense that Zosima has connected with Ivan on a deep level — that, perhaps, Zosima has spoken to Ivan's grief and despair.

"Even if it cannot be resolved in a positive way, it will never be resolved in the negative way either—you yourself know this property of your heart, and therein lies the whole of its torment. But thank the Creator that he has given you a lofty heart, capable of being tormented by such a torment...."⁷ Again, we should be careful to not presume that Zosima's diagnosis is unassailable, but we should give them a lot of weight. We should appreciate the authority of the answer that Zosima has given Ivan. It is an answer that communicates directly with Ivan and causes him to break his detached and unemotional behavior. Immediately after these words, Ivan suddenly rises from his chair, receives his blessing and kisses the elder's hand. He then returns to his chair, firm and serious, and a solemn moment of silence overtakes the room. This answer apparently speaks to Ivan in a profound way.

⁵*ibid*, 70.

⁶*ibid*, 70.

⁷*ibid*, 70.

What, then, is Zosima's answer to Ivan? Zosima's answer is that this question will never be entirely resolved in Ivan's mind. Even according to Zosima, this is a mystery that can never entirely be understood. In many ways, this is precisely the mystery that Job is dealing with. He undoubtedly believes in God, but he cannot understand why he is suffering. It is for this reason that Ivan's argument against accepting God's world is worth studying. In doing so, we might come to a better answer with regards to the question: How are we to understand God's answer to Job? How are we to deal with suffering? If Ivan's argument is worth analyzing, so too is the response put forth in The Brothers Karamazov. This answer, ultimately, is one in which an awareness of Christ's love overwhelms and overcomes our anger towards God, for Job and Ivan's question is not so much whether God exists — this is a firmly held conviction of both — as it is: "How does human suffering affect our relationship with God and can we accept a broken world?"

3.2 Seeing Christ in all People: Interpersonal Faith and Resolution to Suffering

"And yet happiness, happiness — where is it? Who can call himself happy? ... let me tell you everything that I held back last time, that I did not dare to say, everything that I suffer with, and have for so long, so long! I am suffering, forgive me, I am suffering!"⁸ Madame Khokhlavov, the lady of little faith, whose daughter has been ill and unable to walk, admits to Zosima. He responds, "From what precisely... Lack of faith in God?"⁹ Madame Khokhlavov responds: "Oh, no, no I dare not even think of that, but the life after death — it's such a riddle! ... I give you my greatest word that I am not speaking lightly now, that this thought about a future life after death troubles me to point of suffering, terror and fright....”¹⁰ And here Zosima replies with great compassion: ”I believe completely in the genuineness of your anguish.”¹¹ The force behind this response is a great realism that knows true and great suffering. This is the great realism that often accompanies deep faith — the sort of realism that often accompanies the ‘dark night of the soul’ and the great ‘perhaps’ that gives the atheist troubles in Ratzinger’s Introduction to Christianity.¹²

⁸ibid, 55.

⁹ibid, 55.

“Oh, how grateful I am to you! You see, I close my eyes and think: if everyone has faith, where does it come from? And then they say that it all came originally from fear of the awesome phenomena of nature, and that there is nothing to it at all. What? I think, all my life I’ve believed, then I die, and suddenly there’s nothing, and only ‘burdock will grown on my grave,’ as I read in one writer? Though I believed only when I was a little child, mechanically, without thinking about anything... How, how can it be proved? I’ve come now to throw myself at your feet [Zosima’s feet] and ask you about it. If I miss this chance, too, then surely no one will answer me for the rest of my life. ... It’s devastating, devastating!” “No doubt it is devastating. One cannot prove anything here, but it is possible to be convinced.” “How? By what?” “By the experience of active love.

¹⁰ibid, 55.

¹¹ibid, 56.

¹²Pope Benedict XVI quotes this story from M. Buber’s Werke, vol 3 (Munich and Heidelberg, 1963), p. 348: “An adherent of the Enlightenment [writes Buber], a very learned man, who had heard of the Rabbi of Berdichev, paid a visit to him in order to argue, as was his custom, with him, too, and to shatter his old-fashioned proofs of the truth of his faith. When he entered the Rabbi’s room, he found him walking up and down with a book in his hand, rapt in thought. The Rabbi paid no attention to the new arrival. Suddenly he stopped, looked at him fleetingly, and said, “But perhaps it is true after all.” The scholar tried in vain to collect himself—his knees trembled, so terrible was the Rabbi to behold and so terrible his simple utterance to hear. But Rabbi Levi Yitschak now turned to face him and spoke quite calmly: “My son, the great scholars of the Torah with whom you have argued wasted their words on you; as you departed you laughed at them. They were unable to lay God and his Kingdom on the table before you, and neither can I. But think, my son, perhaps it is true.” The exponent of the Enlightenment opposed him with all his strength; but this terrible “perhaps” that echoed back at him time after time broke his resistance.”

Try to love your neighbors actively and tirelessly. The more you succeed in loving, the more you'll be convinced of the existence of God and the immortality of your soul. And if you reach complete selflessness in the love of your neighbor, then undoubtedly you will believe, and no doubt will even be able to enter your soul. This has been tested. It is certain.”¹³

Working from our analysis — the first thing that becomes clear is that we cannot ‘prove active love’ in the same way that we can prove a philosophical argument. One of the very premises of active love is that the convincing nature of practicing active love does not come from intellectual assent, it comes through the very difficult work of embracing the reality of the human condition, the finitude of life and the darkness that man is capable of doing. It comes in learning to love man and life in all of its aspects, unconditionally. This sort of love encompasses all aspects of the human — the physical, the intellectual and the spiritual. Just as Christ assumed — and embraced — all aspects of the human condition, so too does active love operate (like faith) on all levels of human nature. This being the case, our ‘proof’ of active love is going to be one in which all these aspects of the human condition are addressed.

One form that is able to speak on all of these levels is the novel — and this is precisely what The Brothers Karamazov presents us with. In this novel, we not only hear the intellectual argument for active love, but we also see how it affects the human person through the lives of the characters and we ourselves are touched by the lives of the characters. Thus, in ‘proving’ active love, we follow Zosima as he explains it and teaches it to all who will listen. And in following Zosima, we can see for ourselves whether or not we are ‘convinced’.

¹³Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue, 56.

Madame Khokhlavov explains to Zosima that she has a great love for humanity: "You see, I love mankind so much that — would you believe it? — I sometimes dream of giving up all, all I have, of leaving Lise and going to become a sister of mercy. I close my eyes, I think and dream, and in such moments I feel an invincible strength in myself."¹⁴ Here Zosima says, not without a bit of humor, "It's already a great deal and very well for you that you dream of that in your mind and not of something else. Once in a while, by chance, you may really do some good deed."¹⁵

Here the madame cuts to the heart of her problem — "Yes, but could I survive such a life for long?" She goes on to explain that one of her primary motivators for her love of mankind is immediate gratitude — "if there's anything that would immediately cool my 'active' love for mankind, that one thing is ingratitude. In short, I work for pay and demand my pay at once, that is, praise and a return of love for my love. Otherwise I'm unable to love anyone!"¹⁶ Zosima continues to explain to Madame Khokhlavov that she will make no progress in convincing herself if she merely speaks sincerely in order to be praised for her sincerity. Zosima is so astute in his analysis that she cries out, "You've brought me back to myself, you've caught me out and explained me to myself!"¹⁷

And here Zosima spells out the difficulty of active love — it is not naive, nor does it discount human suffering. Instead, it embraces this suffering and accepts reality as it is, without ever losing hope: "If you do not attain happiness, always remember that you are on a good path, and try not to leave it. Above all, avoid lies, all lies, especially the lie to yourself."¹⁸ ... Never be frightened at your own faintheartedness in attaining love, and meanwhile do not even be very frightened by your own bad ¹⁴ibid, 56.

¹⁵ibid, 56.

¹⁶ibid, 57.

¹⁷ibid, 58.

¹⁸Note this realism — the very realism of Ivan Karamazov!

acts. I am sorry that I cannot say anything more comforting, for active love is a harsh and fearful thing compared with love in dreams. Love in dreams thirsts for immediate action, quickly performed, and with everyone watching. Indeed, it will go as far as the giving even of one's life, provided it does not take long but is soon over, as on stage, and everyone is looking on and praising. Whereas active love is labor and perseverance, and for some people, perhaps, a whole science."¹⁹

Here the realism of active love becomes clear. Active love is not naive, it does not seek immediate action (like Alyosha), it is labor and perseverance. Active love is a way of life that is realistic in its very nature — so much so that it even takes into account the apparent injustices of life, those moments in which acts of love are not returned and in which we cannot make sense of reality.

"But I predict that even in that very moment when you see with horror that despite all your efforts, you not only have not come nearer your goal but seem to have gotten farther from it, at that very moment — I predict this to you — you will suddenly reach your goal and will clearly behold over you the wonder-working power of the Lord, who all the while has been loving you, and all the while has been mysteriously guiding you."²⁰

This statement sounds surprisingly like a description of the events that befall Job. Despite all of Job's efforts, at the very moment in which he feels that he cannot continue on, his faith is restored by an encounter with God himself, who reveals His love for Job through creation and through the restoration of Job's livelihood. But, for active love, an argument that seemingly embraces such realism, to argue that God's love will be revealed at that very moment ... this just seems to be an incoherent argument. Logically, this argument depends on the premise of actively loving one's neighbor (presupposing faith in God and His goodness), which will then lead to knowing God and His goodness. It sounds as if this is a self-fulfilling prophecy or simply seeing what one wants to see. But at this point we must remember: Ivan and Job do not doubt God (nor His goodness). Rather, they are both simply not fully convinced. This starting premise is fulfilled for both Ivan and Job and the 'self-fulfillingness' of active love is lost through the very trials and tribulations of active love itself, purged by them, so to speak.

¹⁹ibid, 58.

²⁰ibid, 58.

CHAPTER 4

ACCEPTING REALITY

4.1 Ivan Karamazov's Rebellion

In this section, then, we will analyze Ivan's argument as it is put forth Dostoevsky's Brothers Karamazov, Book 5, Part 4 (Rebellion) and Part 5 (The Grand Inquisitor) after a short introduction to Rebellion. Ivan and Alyosha are talking over tea when Ivan explains his great desire to live and his love for life to Alyosha: "If I did not believe in life, if I were to lose faith in the woman I love, if I were to lose faith in the order of things, even if I were to become convinced on the contrary, that everything is a disorderly, damned, and perhaps devilish chaos, if I were struck even by all the horrors of human disillusionment—still I would want to live..."¹ This love for life is deeply rooted in Ivan and it is clearly associated in the text to the sensual nature of the Karamazov men — the 'sensualists'. This visceral desire for life is dramatically opposed to Ivan's 'Euclidean mind'.² Ivan is even willing to admit this: "I want to live, and I do live, even if it be against logic."³ Thus, in this introduction we already see an acknowledgement on Ivan's part that he is not merely a logical being. He is, instead, a human being, with the human desire to live. This point is important to note as it relates to the the discussion of the limitations of reason, the interplay between faith and reason, and the realm of knowledge that faith deals in. In this particular case, Ivan has admitted that his reason cannot explain to him why he desires to live, nor can it explain his love for "the sticky little leaves that come out in the spring”, nor his loved ones, nor his sensitivity towards the suffering innocent. This sensitivity towards the suffering innocent might, in fact, point back to God himself.

¹ibid, 230.

²ibid, 235.

³ibid, 230.

The next important point to notice in this section is that Ivan admits a number of important beliefs: a strong belief in God, a belief in our limited view of God and His intentions, and that it is ”this world of God’s, created by God,” that he does not accept and cannot agree with.⁴

”And so, I accept God, not only willingly, but moreover I also accept his wisdom and his purpose, which are completely unknown to us; I believe in order, in the meaning of life, I believe in eternal harmony, in which we are all supposed to merge, I believe in the Word for whom the universe is yearning, and who himself was ’with God,’ who himself is God, and so on....”⁵

So Ivan accepts God willingly... and yet he still willingly refuses God’s world. This refusal even comes in light of his ”childlike conviction that the sufferings will be healed and smoothed over, that the whole offensive comedy of human contradictions will disappear like a pitiful mirage, a vile concoction of man’s Euclidean mind ... it will suffice not only to make forgiveness possible, but also to justify everything that has happened with men.”⁶ In other words, Ivan has articulated a fairly complex framework for suffering. This is a framework in which suffering can be justified and one that even articulates and accepts the mystery of how suffering will be justified.

Notice that Ivan calls this particular belief — that suffering will be justified — a ’childlike conviction’. This is a conviction, perhaps, that is similar to his desire for life which cannot be explained, but in a very real sense it is different from a desire for life. It is a conviction — or as another translation has it, Ivan says: ”I believe like a child that suffering will be healed...” — and thus, it certainly has a different sense than desire. A desire implies an urge and propels Ivan towards action, to live life. A conviction or a belief implies something more akin to knowledge or wisdom — something that is known not particularly through reason, but through faith. A conviction or a belief, particularly a childlike belief, here makes us wonder what a mature belief would be like? Furthermore, what is child-like about the belief? The object of the belief — that everything will be healed — or the nature of the belief — an childlike belief as opposed to a mature belief?

⁴ibid, 235.

⁵ibid, 235.

⁶ibid, 235.

If this is meant to describe that nature of the belief, perhaps Ivan considers to be childlike because it is an expression of faith, as opposed to a logical deduction or a reasonable induction. The evidence against this, however, is Ivan’s own recognition of sincere, illogical desires within his own heart. But this evidence is not conclusive because Ivan has made a distinction between desire and belief. And yet, we grow in assurance that this is perhaps what Ivan means because he wants his dilemma to be solved... ”But can it be resolved in myself? Resolved in a positive way?”⁷ he says to Zosima. This question itself shows us that Ivan is looking to solve the paradox himself, within himself and perhaps by himself. It also shows us that Ivan has a desire to resolve it positively — that is, Ivan has a desire to find a way to make God’s existence and human suffering work together. And here we remember Zosima’s answer that it cannot be resolved. This particular kind of belief — a child-like belief — is paralleled in Alyosha’s somewhat naive nature and his own somewhat naive belief as he is seen to have his very own crisis of faith after Zosima’s death.

⁷ibid, 68.

4.2 Alyosha's Lapse of Faith

In fact, Rowan Williams ties Alyosha together with Ivan in that he says both Alyosha and Ivan say: "God exists but I am not sure whether I believe in him..."⁸ As we see in the novel, Alyosha's faith is transformed from its naive state to a more mature faith throughout the course of the novel. As Williams puts it: "Alyosha has sensed a divine abundance and liberty that exceeds human standards of success and failure; his belief has been transformed—but not in the sense that he has become convinced of God's existence. It is rather that he now sees clearly what might be involved in a life that would merit being called a life of faith."⁹ Thus, in seeing the parallel with Alyosha's own crisis of faith, we can begin to see an answer to Ivan's problem — we begin to see what a mature faith might look like. This is an idea that we will explore after we more fully layout Ivan's dilemma as expressed in his Rebellion and in the Grand Inquisitor. But, for the sake of thinking while writing, we can express briefly (and primarily in William's thoughts and words) what this mature faith might look like: "What [Dostoevsky] does in Karamazov is not to demonstrate that it is possible to imagine a life so integrated and transparent that the credibility of faith becomes unassailable;" — note that this is precisely what is envisioned in Ivan's child-like faith, a vision of a life that integrates the paradox of suffering in God's world in such a way that it can transparently be understood and framed neatly — "it is simply to show that faith moves and adapts, matures and reshapes itself, not by adjusting its doctrinal content ... but by relentless stripping away from faith of egotistical or triumphalistic expectations. The credibility of faith is in its freedom to let itself be judged and to grow."¹⁰ In other words, in Williams' reading of the novel, ⁸Williams, Rowan. Dostoevsky: Language, Faith, and Fiction, viii.

⁹ibid, viii.

¹⁰ibid, x.

Zosima's words ring true — there will never be a resolution to Ivan's dilemma — but, instead, there will be a continual growth of faith. This growth in faith will have the hallmark of humility — humility that is born in the appreciation of the fact that man is a created being and that he is loved by God — the lessons that God of Genesis to which God points Job. "Were you there when I laid the foundations of the earth?"

4.3 Guilty Before All — Accepting Man's Fallen Nature

In continuing our analysis then, we see that both Williams and Zosima agree: Ivan's conviction is also childlike in its object of an integrated and transparent faith, i.e. Ivan's logical framework for the justification of suffering. This being the case, we will now continue into one of Ivan's primary arguments: the impossibility of loving one's neighbors and the resulting evils of the world, particularly in the suffering of innocents. From the very start, notice that this argument is directed against one of Zosima's primary principles of active love. In Zosima's mind, it is through actively loving one's neighbor that we will grow in humility and in faith. Through active love, Zosima teaches, faith will become mature and the question of suffering will quietly fade away. Ivan's argument is neatly summarized in the statement: "Christ's love for people is in its kind a miracle impossible on earth."¹¹ He substantiates this by listing example after example of atrocities — Turks taking delight in torturing children and cutting them from their mother's wombs is a particularly vile example. "I'm not talking about the suffering of grown-ups, they ate the apple and to hell with them, let the devil take them all, but these little ones!"¹² What Ivan cannot accept is precisely the sin-damaged world that Pope Emeritus Benedict discusses in his homilies on creation and he even brings out the despair and hatred within Alyosha: "Shoot him!" Alyosha says and Ivan yells, "Bravo!" — "If even you say so, then . . . A fine monk you are! See what a little devil is sitting in your heart, Alyosha Karamazov!”¹³

¹¹Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue, 237.

¹²ibid, 242.

It is not hard to see Ivan’s point. Christ-like love upon this earth is very difficult indeed... but miraculous?

The idea of a miracle is one that also deserves special attention in The Brothers Karamazov. Remember the connection between Ivan and Alyosha, that at similar points in their lives, they are struggling with a somewhat naive faith — or ‘childlike conviction’ — as Ivan says. In the very beginning of the novel, Alyosha is described in a particularly interesting light — especially in light of Ivan’s statement that “Christ’s love for people is in its kind a miracle impossible on this earth.” Alyosha is described by the narrator as being “even more of a realist than the rest of us.”¹⁴ Furthermore, the narrator describes that a “true realist, if he is not a believer, will always find in himself the strength and ability not to believe in miracles as well, and if a miracle stands before him as an irrefutable fact, he will sooner doubt his own senses than admit the fact.”¹⁵ And it is in this statement that the narrator has connected us once again with Ivan and brought us to a better understanding of Ivan’s true problem: Ivan is struggling with the belief that Christ’s love is possible on earth. This is certainly a key in understanding his argument as it sheds light on what is particularly giving Ivan trouble. And it is Christ and the miracle of the Incarnation to which Alyosha explicitly points Ivan, “you asked just now if there is in the whole world a being who could and would have the right to forgive. But there is such a being, and he can forgive everything, forgive all and for all, because he himself gave his innocent blood for all and for everything. You’ve forgotten about him, but it is on him that the structure is being built [as opposed to on the soul of an innocent child]...”¹⁶

¹³ibid, 243.

¹⁴ibid, 25.

¹⁵ibid, 25.

¹⁶ibid, 246.

In this way, Alyosha responds to Ivan's argument again with a mystery, with an answer similar to Zosima's earlier response to Ivan, but subtly different. Zosima said simply that the paradox would never be resolved within Ivan himself. Within. Alyosha is pointing to a mystery outside of Ivan, the mystery of Christ's incarnation and death, in which the problem of suffering is solved — but in a non-transparent way. We cannot fully understand the miraculous nature of Christ's death. And it is this particular answer that Ivan that Ivan still cannot even accept.

4.4 Christ Crucified — Ivan's Grand Inquisitor

"My poem is called 'The Grand Inquisitor'; it's a ridiculous thing, but I want to tell it to you."¹⁷ And so begins Ivan's Grand Inquisitor. This prose poem of Ivan's reveals a couple of things about Ivan's argument. Firstly, it reveals that Ivan's primary problem with the world that God has created is the freedom that has been given to man. This freedom is what allows for turkish soldiers to cut babies from their mothers' wombs. This freedom is the necessary condition for evil. Coupling this freedom with the impossibility, in Ivan's eyes at least, of humans to love as Christ and we begin to see the dystopia that has evolved in Ivan's mind. How can anyone possibly continue living in such a world where true love for fellow men is an impossible 'miracle'? This world is inherently a world of suffering. And in suffering, of the innocent in particular, "lies the secret of Ivan's atheism, the basis for his 'rebellion'."¹⁸

"In suffering, especially in that of the innocent, man comes up against his extreme limit, comes to the decisive question of his identity, of the sense and nonsense of his living and dying, indeed, of reality pure and simple. Given the overwhelming reality of suffering the life and history of humanity does the suffering, doubting, despairing person really have any other choice? What alternative is there to the rebellion of an Ivan Karamazov against this world of God that he finds so unacceptable...¹⁹ Ivan, himself, is able to recognize an alternative — although he cannot fully convince himself to believe it. This is a second aspect that becomes apparent in his poem. Ivan has an intuition about an alternative to a world of suffering: a world in which men love as Christ do. This is a world of Zosima's 'active love' — as spelled out in the 'Lady of Little Faith'.

¹⁷ibid, 246.

¹⁸Jens, Walter, and Hans Küng. "Religion in the Controversy Over the End of Religion." In Literature and Religion: Pascal, Gryphius, Lessing, Hölderlin, Novalis, Kierkegaard, Dostoyevsky, Kafka. New York: Paragon House, 1991. 227-242, 242.

Here, again, Kung is particularly helpful: "But this world of Ivan, so subtly portrayed, is now contrasted, in serenity and great inner freedom, with an alternative world that has its own plausibility. While Ivan primarily talks, Alyosha acts. Dostoyevsky was convinced that on the ultimate theological issues rational argumentation was impotent."²⁰ ²¹ Thus, the very fact that Ivan has Christ kissing the Grand Inquisitor is a certain admission of Ivan's that this argument does not exist purely within the realm of reason. This is corroborated by both Ivan's illogical desire to live as well as his irrational rebellion. Remember that his rebellion is irrational in this sense: despite being able to give an account of how it could be possible for suffering to be permitted and justified, and even having a 'childlike conviction', Ivan still rebels.

Bringing this back to the Grand Inquisitor, we have learned that Ivan does not believe that humans can love as Christ and that freedom is the condition of God's ¹⁹ibid, 234.

²⁰ibid, 236.

²¹Note: this is a theme that has been explored in some detail with our discussion of the importance of faith operating on a separate plane than reason. This is a theme that we will further explore in the form of narrative in Eleonore Stump's work on Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering.

world that enables men bring about suffering of the innocent.²² Ivan's story begins with Christ coming to earth once more as a man in the town of Seville, where he alludes to a burning during the Inquisition in which "had burned almost a hundred heretics at once ad maiorem gloriam Dei."²³ He describes how Christ was both unobserved and yet "every one recognized Him." Here it is worth noting that Ivan thinks these are some of the best lines in the poem: "This could be one of the best passages in the poem, I mean, why it is exactly that they recognize him. People are drawn to him by an invincible force, they flock to him, surround him, follow him. He passes silently among them with a quiet smile of infinite compassion."²⁴ Ivan continues to describe how Christ performs a couple of miracles — healing a blind man and raising a child from the dead. While this Christ is certainly similar to the one that we see in the Gospels, it is perhaps important to note three things: Ivan's Christ is incarnated as an adult man, he is described as if everyone suddenly recognizes that he is Christ and people flock to him as if they cannot help but believe in him — the 'invincible force'.

This is in contrast to Christ almost being killed by the people of his home town, the people who had grown up with Christ, in Luke 4:14-30. In other words, the people who had watched Christ grow up right in front of their eyes did not recognize him as the Son of God. "Who do men say that the Son of man is?" And they said, "Some say John the Baptist, others say Eli'jah, and others Jeremiah or one of the prophets. He said to them, "But who do you say that I am?" Simon Peter replied, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God... For flesh and blood has not revealed this to ²²Note: Zosima's interaction with the Lady of Little Faith is a direct counter to Ivan's main argument. Zosima believes that it is only through loving our neighbors as Christ loved us that we can ultimately find peace and be convinced of God's presence.

²³Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue, 243.

²⁴ibid, 249.

you, but my Father who is in heaven.”²⁵ Only Simon Peter knew the answer to this question — and this knowledge was not revealed to him by any flesh and blood, but by God himself. This is quite the contrast to Ivan’s account of Christ.

Of course, Ivan’s description of Christ is fictional and it occurs 15 centuries after Christ first lived. This might account for the fact that people recognize him. But, on the other hand, we still see in Scripture that Christ was not universally recognized, nor was he universally accepted as he appears to be in this poem of Ivan’s. If Christ were to come down to earth, is this what Ivan would expect to happen? This image that Ivan has is perhaps in-line with his ‘childlike-conviction’ that we discussed earlier. It is an image that might be considered immature in this sense: Christ became fully man. Christ is not super-human, he is human. This means that Christ suffered, that he cried and that he confronted the suffering of those around him continually throughout his life. He brought people back from the dead, but he also cried at their deaths. Furthermore, in redeeming man through his death on the cross, Christ did not negate the fact that human beings suffer. In fact, he reaffirmed the harsh reality of the world in his death.

The Grand Inquisitor takes Christ captive and questions him — although he does not permit Christ to speak. In his questioning, he explains that through the Inquisition he (and the Roman Catholic church) has “finally overcome freedom” and they “have done so in order to make people happy.”²⁶ The Grand Inquisitor continues to explain that God created man a rebel, that he knew man was a rebel from the very beginning, and that God knew that there would be only way way of arranging human happiness: through the fear and piety that is fostered by the Grand Inquisitor’s church. “‘Man was made a rebel; can rebels be happy? ... you rejected the only way of arranging for human happiness, but fortunately, on your departure, you handed the work over to us.’”²⁷ Here again we see two important ideas relating to Ivan’s conception of freedom and human nature: freedom is at odds with men’s happiness and that man ‘was created a rebel’. If man was created a rebel, it follows logically that he is going to abuse his freedom and from this view a natural skepticism towards man’s ability to love in a Christlike way emerges. We are beginning to see, then, that Ivan’s rebellion is partially a product of his cynicism.

²⁵Edited by May, Herbert G., and Bruce Manning Metzger. The New Oxford Annotated Bible, Matthew 16:13-18.

²⁶Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue, 251.

This cynicism manifests itself particularly in the Grand Inquisitors statement: “But you did not know that as soon as man rejects miracles, he will at once reject God as well, for man seeks not so much God as miracles.”²⁸ It is this very miraculousness that Ivan paints Christ in, Christ with light and power radiating from his eyes, and perhaps this fixation on the miraculous is another key to Ivan’s problem. If he is correct in his view, that “man seeks not so much God as miracles” there is a certain sense in which God can be proven to men and Christian morality can be instilled in them. In fact, this is exactly the sort of society that the Grand Inquisitor is seeking to uphold — one in which the Church upholds society and its laws by upholding this miraculousness in a totalitarian sort of way.

This totalitarian society is all based on the mystery that only a few will be able to be Christlike — that all the rest of men will not be able to live up to the ‘impossible’ standards of Christianity. This sentiment becomes clear in this statement: “But remember that there were only several thousand of them, and they were gods. What of the rest? Is it the fault of the rest of feeble mankind that they could not endure what the mighty endured?”²⁹ In other words, the mystery for Ivan is that man was created as a rebel and, as such, man cannot become Christlike. This is the source of Ivan's cynicism.

²⁷ibid, 251.

²⁸ibid, 255.

²⁹ibid, 256.

4.5 Active Love: A Response to Ivan Karamazov

In our analysis of Ivan's Grand Inquisitor, one of the predominant themes that became clear was that Ivan's primary problem is that he believes it is impossible for man to love as Christ did. It is this premise that leads Ivan to conclude that only by miracles and authority can men, who are born as rebels, be tamed. Furthermore, Ivan's anger at God stems from the fact that Ivan believes that the only possible outcome of giving man free will was that men would become ruthless. Ivan has a lot of evidence to support his claim that men cannot love as Christ did. This is the evidence he presents in the Rebellion. Although Ivan has evidence to the contrary, the text of the Brothers Karamazov presents an argument against Ivan's cynicism, his rebellion and his despair.

This argument consists primarily of Zosima's principle of active love. Active love encompasses a number of principles that we have seen throughout the texts of Job and Genesis. In particular, it is characterized by: mature faith, proper perspective, gratitude, humility and action. I highlight the active nature of 'active love' to elucidate the point that the answer to the problem of suffering is not purely an intellectual endeavor. It is, instead, a way of living that brings together all aspects of the human being — the physical, the intellectual and the spiritual. After all, in the Incarnation, Christ assumes the full nature of man — the physical, the intellectual and the spiritual. Christ suffered pain, felt compassion and dealt with the finiteness of humanity. Understanding this is one of the keys to understanding active love and it is this very principle that is embodied in a number of points throughout the book. The decay of Zosima's body, for example, illustrates this very finitude that Christ assumed in becoming fully man. Furthermore, Alyosha's initial despair over Zosima's decay illustrates the immature faith that Ivan is also subject to — this is a faith that cannot accept the reality of human nature and its finitude.

Ivan and Alyosha's faith, however, is not so simple that it could be called naive. Although Ivan has a 'childlike-conviction' that all suffering will be justified and although his Grand Inquisitor points to miracles making men obedient, we still get the sense that a miracle would not convince Ivan himself to embrace the reality of human nature — this is clear in the sarcastic and insincere tone in which Ivan tells his story. "But it's nonsense, Alyosha, it's just the muddled poem of a muddled student who never wrote two lines of verse. Why are you taking it so seriously?"³⁰ And, again, with Alyosha we are told explicitly that he is not naive — rather, it seems that he has not fully embraced the reality of human nature. "I will say this much," says the narrator, "it was not a matter of miracles. It was not an expectation of miracles, frivolous in its impatience. Alyosha did not need miracles then for the triumph of certain convictions..."³¹ The narrator tells us that Alyosha was seeking "only a 'higher justice'" and that this 'higher justice' had been violated in the decay of Zosima's body — and "it was this that wounded his heart so cruelly and suddenly."³² Perhaps what we are seeing in Ivan and Alyosha's faith is not so much a naive faith seeking miracles — Alyosha, after all, as he is described by the narrator was "even more of a realist than the rest of us."³³ It is certainly within the text to say that Ivan is a realist, himself. Ivan does not deceive himself and his realism has manifested itself in his cynicism and despair. And this is why miracles are not what will bring these two Karamazov brothers to faith — for it "is not miracles that bring a realist to faith."³⁴ Instead, then, perhaps what we are seeing in Ivan and Alyosha is an undeveloped

³⁰ibid, 262.

³¹ibid, 339.

³²ibid, 339.

³³ibid, 25.

³⁴ibid, 25.

faith coming to grips with its realism. They are both, in their own ways, learning to embrace the reality of the human condition. What else does Christ's kiss of the Grand Inquisitor or Alyosha kissing the ground (the earth — the very substance from which God formed man) symbolize than embracing man's nature and finitude?

Ivan and Alyosha's faith, however, is not so simple that it could be called naive. Although Ivan has a 'childlike-conviction' that all suffering will be justified and although his Grand Inquisitor points to miracles making men obedient, we still get the sense that a miracle would not convince Ivan himself to embrace the reality of human nature — this is clear in the sarcastic and insincere tone in which Ivan tells his story. "But it's nonsense, Alyosha, it's just the muddled poem of a muddled student who never wrote two lines of verse. Why are you taking it so seriously?"³⁵ And, again, with Alyosha we are told explicitly that he is not naive — rather, it seems that he has not fully embraced the reality of human nature. "I will say this much," says the narrator, "it was not a matter of miracles. It was not an expectation of miracles, frivolous in its impatience. Alyosha did not need miracles then for the triumph of certain convictions..."³⁶ The narrator tells us that Alyosha was seeking "only a 'higher justice'" and that this 'higher justice' had been violated in the decay of Zosima's body — and "it was this that wounded his heart so cruelly and suddenly."³⁷ Perhaps what we are seeing in Ivan and Alyosha's faith is not so much a naive faith seeking miracles — Alyosha, after all, as he is described by the narrator was "even more of a realist than the rest of us."³⁸ It is certainly within the text to say that Ivan is a realist, himself. Ivan does not deceive himself and his realism has manifested itself in his cynicism and despair. And this is why miracles are not what will bring these two ³⁵ibid, 262.

³⁶ibid, 339.

³⁷ibid, 339.

³⁸ibid, 25.

Karamazov brothers to faith — for it "is not miracles that bring a realist to faith."³⁹ Instead, then, perhaps what we are seeing in Ivan and Alyosha is an undeveloped faith coming to grips with its realism. They are both, in their own ways, learning to embrace the reality of the human condition. What else does Christ's kiss of the Grand Inquisitor or Alyosha kissing the ground (the earth — the very substance from which God formed man) symbolize than embracing man's nature and finitude?

Here we can draw parallels with Job. Job was not seeking miracles, so much as he was seeking a way to comprehend what was happening to him and relief from his suffering. "I cry to thee and thou dost not answer me; I stand, and thou dost not heed me. Thou hast turned cruel to me; ... Yea, I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living."⁴⁰ Job's speech ends with a great bevy of oratorical hypothetical questions — "if I have raised my hand against the fatherless because I saw help in the gate; then let my shoulder blade fall from my shoulder, and let my arm be broken from its socket."⁴¹ Job, too, is a realist who is approaching the situation from a perspective of faith in God, just like Ivan and Alyosha. Job does not deny — and, in fact, he embraces — the punishment that he would deserve if he had been guilty of these sins. But, like Ivan and Alyosha, he has come to his wits end in trying to understand what is happening to him. "For I was in terror of calamity from God, and I could not have faced his majesty."⁴² Notice, Job once was at a point where he could not question God, but he is now beyond that point. His suffering has brought his faith to a breaking point — his suffering has brought him to the point of speaking with God directly.

³⁹ibid, 25.

⁴⁰Edited by May, Herbert G., and Bruce Manning Metzger. "The Book of Job." In The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha: Revised standard version, Job 30: 20-25.

⁴¹ibid, Job 31: 21-22.

⁴²ibid, Job 31:23.

Zosima's response to Ivan's dilemma is clearest in his interaction with the mysterious visitor. As it turns out, this visitor of Zosima's had committed the murder of a woman with whom he was in love, who had rebuked him. The mysterious visitor escaped the crime without being caught, but the crime continually haunted him. Despite his greatest efforts in philanthropy and in raising his own family, he has not been able to avoid the guilt of this crime. This mysterious visitor is drawn to Zosima, who convinces him that he must confess his crime in order to be cleansed of the guilt. In this interaction, we see one of the greatest examples of active love embracing the darkest depravity that humanity knows: murder. There are a few ideas in this section that become clear, with the primary one being this: human beings can, in fact, love as Christ did (contra Ivan); but they must gradually be remade anew in order to love fully as Christ did, in giving of himself completely. This is an arduous process of purification of the soul — the process that we see in the Lay of Little Faith — in which one cannot lie to themselves. It is predicated upon loving one's neighbor as oneself. "Know, then, that this dream, as you call it [Kingdom of Heaven on earth], will undoubtedly come true, believe it, though not now, for every action has its law. This is a matter of the soul, a psychological matter. In order to make the world over anew, people themselves must turn onto a different path psychically. Until one has indeed become the brother of all, there will be no brotherhood."⁴³

But, in order for this process to happen, we must be entirely remade through the process of active love and grace, which is often revealed during the darkest trials of faith as we have seen in Zosima's explanation to Madame Khokhov and Alyosha's faith being restored by the smallest act of kindness from the 'sinner' Grushenka. This recreation is best exemplified in John 12:24: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.”⁴⁴ This is Christ’s prophecy of his death. It is also the epithet of The Brothers Karamazov. This verse alone embodies the harsh reality: corn must die in order to bring forth life; but it also brings forth the greatest hope in the form of ‘much fruit’.

⁴³ibid, 303.

⁴⁴ibid, 309.

CHAPTER 5

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

The thesis that has been argued for in this paper proposes that the problem of suffering, an inherently interpersonal problem, must be solved in an all-inclusive way of life that is much more than a ‘philosophy of life’. The exact way of life that is proposed is Zosima’s active love that is displayed in Dostoevsky’s Brothers Karamazov. Active love is a way of being that has three particular characteristics: it is rooted in gratitude and a proper understanding of man’s relationship with God (i); it is characterized by proper perspective (ii) in two ways: it recognizes that suffering is not always going to be understandable (iii) and it focuses on particulars instead of broad and complicated generalities (it deals with a particular person instead of ‘humanity’) (iv); it accepts reality as it is, whether that be man’s fallenness or in a sort of ‘higher justice or purpose’ of suffering manifesting itself in this life (v). In these ways, active love is firmly compatible with Christianity and, in fact, is a clear ‘way of life’ that is rooted in Christianity.

Gratitude necessarily follows from the Christian belief that we are created beings entirely dependent on God — the very God who made man in his image and breathed life into him. Just as Christ told us that we serve him by serving the poor, so too does active love focus on seeing Christ in all people. Just as Christ could not avoid death on a cross, so too man cannot avoid suffering. Christ became fully human, accepting man on man’s own terms of fallenness, and suffered despite his innocence. Yet, precisely the point that was darkest in the Christian narrative — Christ’s complete gift of himself — was also its great triumph. This is exactly the message that Zosima teaches: when one has given themselves entirely, when they are at their breaking point, precisely at that point will God's grace restore them and invigorate them.

Gratitude and man's relationship with God (i) and man's proper relationship with God was the focus of the first section. In this section, we learned through analysis of the Book of Job, Genesis and Pope Benedict XVI's homilies on creation that man is a created being who is entirely dependent on God and that God is a loving creator who longs for a personal, loving relationship with His creation. Gratitude is a fundamental element of Zosima's philosophy of active love and this is seen in his interpretation of Job. This particular interpretation is highlighted by the mystery of life — that suffering fades quietly into joy, that Job is given an opportunity to praise God by essentially saying, "Look, Lord. Your creation is good", and that Christ himself could not avoid death on a cross. Suffering is an inescapable reality, but if it is borne with gratitude, joy can spring from its ashes. Proper perspective (ii) was discussed in the following section, with the intention of elucidating two points: that Ivan Karamazov's dilemma will never be completely resolved (iii) and that the key to active love is seeing Christ in all people (iv). This proper perspective becomes especially clear in Zosima's interaction with the Lady of Little Faith. The key passages here are those in which Zosima explains to the Lady of Little Faith that her anguish is genuine and not unfounded. The 'great perhaps' is a real issue and it does not hide from those with even the greatest faith. He tells her that she can be convinced, but only by living out the arduous task of actively loving her neighbor and giving completely of herself. And, even while she is doing this, great emphasis is placed on the fact that she will be convinced of God only at her darkest point. In this way, we can understand that the dilemma itself cannot really be resolved by us. The grace that resolves the dilemma and convinces us comes as a revelation, at the moment when faith is at its darkest point. This is a direct counter to Ivan's question of "will it ever be resolved?"

The final section of the paper focused on active love's emphasis on accepting life as it is (v). In this final section, we analyzed Ivan's Rebellion and his Grand Inquisitor, who represents Ivan's greatest doubt: that man can love as Christ loved. In this section, we learned that Ivan struggles to accept reality as it is. Reality is that Turkish soldiers kill innocent mothers and their children — there is much suffering in the world as a direct result of human malevolence. This is reality. Zosima's active love is able to overcome this reality by the very fact that it embraces this reality, just as Christ embraced this reality. True love for one's neighbor embraces the complete depravity of man, accepts it and is able to repair man's depravity. This process is not easy and it involves a genuine death. Death of the fallen man to be reborn as new. Actively loving one's neighbor is the way in which this process occurs: "Know, then, that this dream, as you call it [Kingdom of Heaven on earth], will undoubtedly come true, believe it, though not now, for every action has its law. This is a matter of the soul, a psychological matter. In order to make the world over anew, people themselves must turn onto a different path psychically. Until one has indeed become the brother of all, there will be no brotherhood."¹ In other words, through active love, we are able to die unto ourselves through the gift of ourselves to others and be remade anew. This is why the words of John 12:24 ring true throughout the text of the Brothers Karamazov: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."² And this, too, is why it "is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."³ Reality is undeniably hard, but Zosima's active love, embodied in Christ who is understood through the lens of John 12:24, is a way of life that is able to confront Ivan Karamazov's greatest doubts head on.

¹ibid, 303.

²ibid, 309.

³ibid, 309.

Bibliography

- Aquinas, Thomas. Translated by Brian Mulladay. Edited by Joseph Kenny, O.P.. "Commentary on the Book of Job." Thomas Aquinas: Commentary on Job: English. <http://dhsprory.org/thomas/SSJob.htm> (accessed December 8, 2013).
- Dostoyevsky, Fyodor. Translated by Richard Pevear, and Larissa Volokhonsky. The Brothers Karamazov: A Novel in Four Parts with Epilogue. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2002.
- Gregory the Great. Translated by John H. Parker. "Moralia in Job (Morals on the Book of Job)." Moralia in Job (Morals on the Book of Job). <http://www.lectionarycentral.com/GregoryMoraliaIndex.html> (accessed December 8, 2013).
- Jens, Walter, and Hans Küng. "Religion in the Controversy Over the End of Religion." In Literature and Religion: Pascal, Gryphius, Lessing, Hölderlin, Novalis, Kierkegaard, Dostoyevsky, Kafka. New York: Paragon House, 1991. 227-242.
- Edited by May, Herbert G., and Bruce Manning Metzger. "The Book of Job." In The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha: Revised standard version, containing the second edition of the New Testament and an expanded edition of the Apocrypha. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977. 613-655.
- Osborn, Ronald. "Beauty Will Save the World: Metaphysical Rebellion and the Problem of Theodicy in Dostoevsky's Brothers Karamazov." Modern Age 54, no. 1-4 (2012). http://www.academia.edu/2512653/Beauty_Will_Save_the_World_Metaphysical_Rebellion_and_the_Problem_of_Theodicy_in_Dostoevskys_Brothers_Karamazov (accessed December 7, 2013).
- Ramsey, O.P., Boniface, and Pope Benedict XVI. In the Beginning: A Catholic Understanding of the Story of Creation and the Fall. Grand Rapids, Mich.: W.B. Eerdmans Pub. Co., 1995.
- Schifferdecker, Kathryn. Out of the Whirlwind: Creation Theology in the Book of

Job. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard Theological Studies, Harvard Divinity School
:, 2008.

Stump, Eleonore. Wandering in Darkness: Narrative and the Problem of Suffering.
Oxford: Clarendon Press ;, 2010.

Stump, Eleonore. Edited by Eleonore Stump and Norman Kretzmann. "Aquinas on the Sufferings of Job." In Reasoned Faith: Essays in Philosophical Theology in Honor of Norman Kretzmann. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1993. 328-357.

Williams, Rowan. Dostoevsky: Language, Faith, and Fiction. London: Continuum, 2009.

XVI, Pope Benedict. Introduction to Christianity. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 2004.